you're human

paraphrased text here Life is a fleeting moment. Have you ever been in that serene morning when the sun rises over the horizon, filling the air with an eerie silence? The stillness brings a profound beauty to life. Ever felt like time is slowing down as you wait for it to stand still, just so the world can pause and breathe? It's as if we're running from our own mortality. Life is too short, and that's why we rush through every moment, desperately seeking more time to live, love, and cherish. Have you ever caught a glimpse of the moon on its ascent, feeling an overwhelming longing for something just out of reach? Maybe it was a loved one who passed away, leaving us with a void that only they could fill. We wait for a sign from above, hoping to find solace in a place where love never fades. But life is short, and time keeps moving forward. Sometimes we wish we could turn back the clock, but only if you truly believe in its power. There's a balance between living and crying, between taking risks and playing it safe. And when you've got someone by your side, that feeling of hope can be all you need to keep going. So, have you ever felt like running through life with reckless abandon, trying to make every moment count? That's what this song is about - embracing the beauty of life while we still can. Life is too short to waste a single second; it's an anthem that reminds us to live, love, and cherish every moment. In a world where time flees like sand between fingers, we're left with the haunting question: what's the purpose of our existence? We rush through life, chasing the ephemeral moments that make it worth living. But is it enough to merely exist, or should we strive for more? The truth lies in believing, yet even that's not a guarantee. Time has its own rhythm, and we're mere spectators to its passage. There are moments to live, moments to cry, but the silence between them is where true beauty resides. Have you ever witnessed dawn breaking over the horizon, painting the sky with hues of hope? Or felt the stillness that precedes a storm, when the air is heavy with anticipation? We yearn for heaven's sign, a guiding light that would lead us to our destiny. But until then, we're left to make sense of this chaos, searching for answers in the stars. Life may be too short, but what if it's not? What if every moment counts, and every decision shapes our path? The angels come from beyond, whispering secrets to those who listen. We run through life, desperate to make the most of it. But perhaps we should pause, breathe, and let the truth sink in. For in stillness lies the key to understanding ourselves and the world around us. And so, we continue to run, fueled by our passions and our fears. Yet, amidst the chaos, we find moments of beauty - a sunrise, a loved one's smile, or the thrill of discovery. Life is too short, but what does that even mean? Is it a warning to cherish every instant, or a reminder that time is our most precious resource?
